SHEA BUTTER is mostly hailed for skin care and for its protecting and emollient properties. Many local soap manufacturers use shea butter as a raw material. Protecting the skin and the hair from the harsh African climate is vital, and this natural product does so beautifully.

As early as 1940, many scientific observations verified that, among the populations using shea butter, the occurrence of skin diseases was scarce and the populations skin was exceptionally supple and smooth.

Almost all historical references we have from pre-19th century Africa mention shea butter. Even as early as Cleopatra's Egypt, there is mention of caravans bearing clay jars of the valuable Shea butter for cosmetic uses. Many of history's great travelers recorded their observations about Africa's culture and its use of shea butter.

Africa's relationship with shea butter is intimate in nature. The funeral beds of late kings are carved in the noble wood of an old shea tree, and shea butter has always served as a staple of African pharmacology. It acts as an effective decongestant, for example. Used for its draining and anti-inflammatory properties, it is soothing in sprains and strains, and is a widely used anti-arthritis treatment.

This wonderful healing agent is also used for accelerating the cicatrization of the umbilical cord and after a circumcision. Shea butter is exceptionally versatile, as expressed in the usage of its by-products: for cooking (as a sauce or for frying), for lamp fuel, and as an insulating material for housing.

The shea tree has many names in Africa: it is called Karité in Wolof, kare or kolo in Peuhl. The English name Shea, is derived from the word se, used by the Bambaras of Central Africa.
